Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Cost of Pumping From Wells for the Irrigation of Rice in Louisiana and Arkansas The greater part of the land devoted to the growth of rice in Louisiana and Texas is irrigated with water raised from streams by large pumping plants and supplied to growers under contracts, the usual rate being one-fifth of the crop. The general provisions of these contracts are as follows: A canal company agrees to furnish a sufficient supply of fresh water for a described tract of land, but is not liable for damage on account of shortage. The water is distributed by the company, which has full control as to the manner of distributing water both to and upon the land and is to be the sole judge of the time when water should be supplied. If the planter wastes water from any cause the company may shut off the supply without forfeiting its right to one-fifth of the crop. In case of sufficient rainfall to mature a crop and the planter draws little water from the company the latter is still entitled to its share of the crop. While the extreme case just cited is never realized in actual practice, the fact remains that the demand for water varies greatly with different seasons. In part to avoid the provisions of these contracts and have an independent supply and in part to cover lands not reached by the large canals, many growers have put down wells and installed their own pumping machinery. For several years the author has been making pump tests in the rice districts, the results of which have been published in previous reports, but with few exceptions...
