Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: . . . classical students, who have already done work of promise, could realize the ideals which they have conceived. It would be most unfortunate if this institution should be hampered in the working out of these commendable plans, and it is hoped that the men in this country to whom it is felt we can reasonably look to furnish substantial encouragement to so worthy a cause will take the necessary steps to insure the permanent efficiency of the institution. It is gratifying to learn that among those who are already displaying an active interest in this movement are many men of large means belonging to the class referred to whose generous attitude toward meritorious projects for the advancement of art in the past has been of benefit to the country at large. held this year in the Coliseum, is just drawing to a close. These annual exhibitions which were planned primarily to disseminate information relating to the durability, fireproofness and economy of concrete construction have undoubtedly exerted a wide influence in the development of the cement industry. According to statistics compiled by the United States Geographical Survey, shipment of Portland Cement in the United States amounted to more than ninety-four million barrels during the year 1916. It seems difficult to harmonize such a statement with the fact that cement manufacturing in the United States is still a comparatively youthful industry. Its remarkable growth can only be accounted for by the inherent properties of the material and the...
