Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER IV. I Went on contemplating and rhyming, while Geofroi continued his strain, the mechanical cadence of which convinced me he was musing too, till I was roused by the dull and hollow sound of a horn, blown, as it seemed to me, on the opposite bank of the river, and echoing or answered in the wood beside me. The insinuations of the inspector rushed upon my mind, and I thought there were few more convenient places for. rifling a poor travellers knapsack, and levying contributions on his purse. But the reader will remark my forbearance, in saying nothing of the determined air with which I cocked my gun, nor the desperate resolution I formed, not to be robbed by less than six highwaymen at any rate. I called out to Geoffroi (in whatever tone my readers may severally fancy) to know what was...
