Excerpt: .once more the situation that confronted as indeed it still confronts vegetation. You recall that as to New York we are dealing with a glaciated terrain. This glaciation effect is expressed in areas of bare, polished rock on the one hand and basins occupied by lakes on the other; in deposits of coarse boulders--particularly glacial moraines--in some quarters and in delta sand plains in others; in former valleys and streamways blocked by glacial filling; in accumulation of glacial till laid down upon hills and valleys; in sand beds of weathered rock covering the granite base over much of the Adirondacks; in mounds and ridges of till--the drumlins, kames, etc.; in well drained deposits of fairly constant moisture content, or too well drained and therefore periodically deficient in moisture (sand, and gravel beds) or in lowlands habitually flooded or with the water table at or near the surface. Of course factors of weathering, erosion and deposition are at work on this terrain tending in the long run to level down and even up but, meanwhile, vegetation is at work, and we not only can see at present how it works and what results it produces but by reviewing the brief period of human history we can gain an idea as to how far vegetation had gone in its general development over the State and the total results accomplished in modifying the character of its surface. Thus we recall that New York was found to be a...
